King's Research Portal

DOI:

10.1080/07075332.2017.1298529

Document Version

Peer reviewed version

Link to publication record in King's Research Portal

Citation for published version (APA):

Chaudhuri, R. (2017). The Making of an 'All Weather Friendship' Pakistan, China and the History of a Border Agreement: 1949–1963. INTERNATIONAL HISTORY REVIEW, 1-24.
<https://doi.org/10.1080/07075332.2017.1298529>

Citing this paper

Please note that where the full-text provided on King's Research Portal is the Author Accepted Manuscript or Post-Print version this may differ from the final Published version. If citing, it is advised that you check and use the publisher's definitive version for pagination, volume/issue, and date of publication details. And where the final published version is provided on the Research Portal, if citing you are again advised to check the publisher's website for any subsequent corrections.

General rights

Copyright and moral rights for the publications made accessible in the Research Portal are retained by the authors and/or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing publications that users recognize and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

- Users may download and print one copy of any publication from the Research Portal for the purpose of private study or research.
- You may not further distribute the material or use it for any profit-making activity or commercial gain
- You may freely distribute the URL identifying the publication in the Research Portal

Take down policy

If you believe that this document breaches copyright please contact librarypure@kcl.ac.uk providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

Abstract

China and Pakistan share what is widely known as an ‘all weather friendship’. The historical roots of this friendship can be traced to 1963, when the two countries entered into a border agreement that divided territory in Pakistan-administered-Kashmir. Since then, China has provided missile and nuclear technology to Pakistan. It has limited the potential for escalation in the time of war between India and Pakistan and is the largest economic investor in Pakistan. The benefits of this friendship for Pakistan are clear. Yet, there is little detail on what led to the making of the ‘all weather friendship’. This article provides a detailed account of Sino-Pakistani relations between 1949 and 1963. It argues that whilst the 1963 agreement led to a turning point, the Pakistani establishment – military and civilian – sought to engage China since 1949. They did so to create strategic options for themselves in the event that the US and the UK – Pakistan’s main allies following independence – limited or worse, ended their support for Pakistan in its troubled relations with India. This article is based on primary sources available in the US, Britain, as well as recently declassified and hitherto unused papers in India.

Key words: China, Pakistan, India, Border Agreement, Cold War

The Making of an ‘All Weather Friendship’ Pakistan, China, and the History of a Border Agreement: 1949 to 1963¹

Rudra Chaudhuri

On 2 March 1963, Pakistan and the People’s Republic of China (PRC) formally entered into a border agreement. 3,400 square miles of disputed territory along the Karakoram Mountain Range – straddling the borders of China, India and Pakistan – was delimited. As a note to the British Joint Intelligence Committee put it immediately after the signing ceremony in Peking, negotiations had been timed to ‘embarrass India and put the greatest strain on Indo-Pakistan relations.’² The Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) reached the same conclusion. ‘Pakistan was motivated’, a report underlined, ‘by a desire to embarrass India.’³ After all, a part of the territory under discussion was in what the CIA often referred to as ‘Pakistan-controlled Kashmir.’⁴ It led to a furiously worded protest by the Indian government. This was, according to Indian officials, disputed territory in what they referred to as ‘Pakistan Occupied Kashmir.’⁵ Riling Indians more was the fact that the border agreement was signed shortly after India was defeated in war by the People’s Liberation Army (PLA). The Sino-Indian Border War, as the 1962 conflict came to be known broke-out on 20 October and ended with a unilateral ceasefire called by the PLA a month later on 21 November.⁶

Further, it was signed a fortnight before Indian and Pakistani leaders were to begin a fourth round of talks on Kashmir in Calcutta. India was pressured into talks by the US President John F. Kennedy and British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan on Pakistan’s beckoning.⁷ A settlement on Kashmir, Kennedy and Macmillan were led to believe, was the only way in which they could justify providing additional military assistance to India – to deter further Chinese incursions – whilst convincing Pakistani President Ayub Khan to remain loyal to a set of western backed military alliances to which he and his predecessors once committed their nation’s fate.⁸ The timing notwithstanding, the territorial agreement with China served to establish the founding basis of what is often referred to as an ‘all weather friendship.’ As Chen Yi, the Chinese Minister for Foreign Affairs stated at the banquet to celebrate the signing of the March agreement, it marked, he fervently argued, a ‘new stage in the development of friendly relations between China and Pakistan.’⁹

In a carefully worded interview to the Associated Press of Pakistan, Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai underlined that whilst Pakistan ‘will make more and more friends’ in parts of the world beyond those closely attached to the Anglo-Western network of alliances, ‘India will become more and more isolated.’¹⁰ Even a cursory reading of the history of the last half-century does little service to Zhou’s estimation.¹¹ Nonetheless, it should not take away from the fact that this period in Pakistani history provided a degree of choice to its leaders both tired and disillusioned by what they believed was the west’s’ inherent fascination with India. Yet, curiously, this crucial period in Sino-Pakistani history has been understudied. Essential questions have been left unanswered. For instance, what exactly led to the eventual border agreement between Pakistan and China? Was it really an opportunity seized by both China and Pakistan at a time India was found licking her wounds following military defeat? How exactly did the negotiations proceed? Finally, has this ‘friendship’ benefited Pakistan in times of crisis?

Existing accounts provide little by way of detail on Pakistan's relations with China in this time. In fact, whether it is first-hand accounts authored by a cast of actors who participated in the crisis or historical works on the same,¹² these questions are left under-examined. For the most part, and in line with the intelligence reports distributed during the Sino-Indian crisis, scholars argue that Pakistan entered these negotiations in May 1962 to indeed embarrass India.¹³ The border agreement, they contend, was in turn a result of Pakistan's frustration with President Kennedy's decision to provide military assistance to India during its war with China. In short, existing accounts narrate only a part of the story of the making of the 'all weather friendship'. They do so largely by focussing on the period between 1962 and 1963. This article provides a more complete account. It argues that whilst the Border War in 1962 provided Ayub with a strategic opportunity he was more than willing to take advantage of, the process of engaging China started well before war broke out in 1962. Further, the agreement itself can scarcely be explained away as a result of increased American assistance to India. Pakistani leaders – and not just Ayub – sought to create a balance in Pakistani foreign policy soon after the creation of the PRC in October 1949.

This is not to say that a diplomatic advance in favour of China was either seamless or pre-destined, but that Pakistani leaders had always desired a closer working relationship with a nation they knew they would need as much as they needed the US or the west more generally. In sum, this article provides a more complete account of how Pakistan slowly but surely negotiated an advance that immediately turned into something more strategic as the final signatures were added to its only border agreement till date. The 'all weather friendship' provided and continues to provide Pakistani leaders with a degree of choice in making crucial decisions. As Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, the youngest Minister in Ayub's Cabinet put it: Pakistan's relations with China are 'an independent factor in our [it's] foreign policy, and not contingent on any other.'¹⁴ Essentially, this 'independent' relationship has since aided Pakistan in building a nuclear arsenal, offered financial assistance when the US and the UK have been unable to, and as importantly, provided both the Generals and politicians in Pakistan with a valuable friend that India has not been able to altogether ignore at the time of war with her western neighbour.¹⁵

The article is divided into four parts. The first provides a short note on sources used for this study and the limitations thereof. The second looks at Sino-Pakistani relations from the time of the birth of the PRC to 1960, when Pakistan seriously considered voting for China's admission to the United Nations (UN). The third focuses on the period between 1960-63, carefully examining Pakistani motivations and actions before, during and after the 1962 Sino-Indian Border War. The fourth and last section looks briefly at the significance of the 'all weather friendship' in times of war and peace in the post 1963 period.

Sources

What significantly impairs any serious historical work on Pakistan is the lack of access to Pakistani public archives and private papers. Some scholars claim to have had sight of papers deposited in the Ministry of Defence (MoD) and the Army's General Headquarters (GHQ).¹⁶ These accounts however cannot be crosschecked. Further, the secondary literature on this period is scant at best.¹⁷ Most accounts published in the first two decades following Pakistani independence or shortly after summarise and analyse news reports and public utterances. Valuable in themselves, they provide little by way of detail.¹⁸ Memoirs and diary-like narratives authored by Pakistani leaders are available but need to be read with caution. For instance, Ayub's autobiography –authored whilst he was still in office– and delicately titled 'Friends not Masters' offers a great deal by way of insight into the Field Marshal's thinking, but these were thoughts tailored primarily for a western public less and less enchanted by Pakistan.¹⁹ The monograph was completed in 1967 and published a year later, providing little distance from the potential entrapments of political expediency. In short, it reflects a well rehearsed public line that can hardly be taken at face value.

With these limitations in mind, this article uses three sets of sources. First, it examines the limited secondary material and a whole range of memoirs authored by a cast of actors present at the time. Second, it cross-references these accounts with edited and published primary material. The most important of these include a collection of 'British Papers' edited by a former Pakistani bureaucrat and select volumes of the Foreign Relations of the United States (FRUS): an almost essential and easily accessible compilation of primary documents.²⁰ Importantly, the article uses recently published volumes of the Selected Works of Jawaharlal Nehru,²¹ a treasure trove that is publicly available but not extensively used. Third, and most importantly, it surveys unpublished papers in the British, and American National Archives, and recently declassified and hitherto unused papers in the Indian National Archives. Further, the article makes selective use of private papers deposited at Churchill College in Cambridge and the Nehru Memorial Museum and Library (NMML) in New Delhi. What follows is a more complete account of how Pakistan –and Ayub in particular– befriended a nation that has become its largest economic investor and supplier of nuclear materials in the present day.²² Moreover, it critically analyses the impact the 'all weather friendship' had on Pakistan's relations with the US – its ally– and in its troubled relationship with India.

1. Troubled Road to Negotiations: 1949 to 1960

The commemorative article of the People's Daily in February 1951 –widely recognised as an organ of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP)– made a special mention of the 'friendship which already exists between the peoples' of India and China.²³ India was one of the first non-communist countries to recognise the PRC in December 1949. What helped, at least in the initial years following communist victory in the civil war was that Indian Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru genuinely believed that the PRC deserved a seat in the UN Security Council, replacing Nationalist China.²⁴ Further, Nehru was acutely aware that 'isolation from outside contacts' added a strong element of 'fear and suspicion' in Mao's China.²⁵ Overcoming this sort of xenophobia required engagement and international recognition of the Communist regime, a task the Prime Minister set out to realise –although unsuccessfully– following the outbreak of war in Korea.²⁶ In turn and as Odd Arne Westad points out, covert Sino-Soviet foreign policy planning after Stalin outlined the need for China to work with nationalist nations like Nehru's India and Sukarno's Indonesia.²⁷

These compulsions were altogether absent when it came to Pakistan. After all, Nehru and not Mohammad Ali Jinnah –the founder of Pakistan and its first Governor General – was the key spokesman in matters to do with foreign affairs prior to Indian and Pakistani independence. It was Nehru who travelled to international conferences meeting representatives sympathetic to Mao's cause. Nehru even travelled to China –where he was when the Second World War broke out in 1939– after which he strongly opposed Japanese imperialism.²⁸ Amongst Indian nationalists, he was best positioned to take the lead on such matters following independence.

This did not however mean that the relatively new bureaucratic landscape in communist Peking ignored Pakistan or vice-versa. Pakistan too recognised China early on 4 January, 1950. According to an official communiqué issued on 24 January, it had ‘withdrawn recognition from [the] Guomindang (GMD) government stationed in Taiwan.’²⁹ In September of the same year, Mohammad Zafarullah Khan –Pakistan’s first Foreign Minister– advocated China’s right to be ‘represented in the United Nations’ on the floor of the General Assembly.³⁰ Formal diplomatic relations were established in April 1951. By June, the PRC’s first Charge de Affairs arrived in Karachi, the Pakistani capital till 1967.³¹ Ambassadors were formally exchanged in November. In fact, by the time the Chinese ambassador designate –Han Nianying– presented his credentials in Karachi both countries had worked swiftly to establish a Pakistan-China Friendship Society. An official invitation was also extended to Pakistan on behalf of Zhou Enlai to attend the Second anniversary of the People’s Republic.³² India under Nehru might have been the likely choice for partnership in the very early years of the PRC, but this certainly did not mean that the soon-to-be Islamic Republic was naturally disadvantaged.³³ That the PRC would be a significant actor in South Asia was recognised immediately by both India and Pakistan.

1.1. Balancing Treaty Obligations

These fast moving diplomatic exchanges between China and Pakistan did not go unnoticed. As one cable from the Commonwealth Relations Office (CRO) in London bluntly put it, ‘the large new Chinese embassy in Karachi is getting down to work.’ British diplomats were convinced that Pakistan was looking to forge a closer relationship with China.³⁴ The timing was moot. India at the time was struggling to balance its own relations between the US, the Soviet Union, and the PRC in its role as an active participant in negotiating an end to the War in Korea.³⁵ This exercise left Nehru with little goodwill in Peking. Pakistan on the other hand and as British officials confirm, understood this to be an opportunity to be exploited.³⁶ China too was looking for an opening with Pakistan.

To be sure, the decision by the government of British Prime Minister Clement Attlee to first oppose and then –because of American pressure– support a ban on oil exports to China rattled officials in Peking.³⁷ At a time when a young PRC was increasingly isolated, establishing a working relationship with Pakistan was considered imperative. Yet, and till at least the First Afro-Asian conference in Bandung in 1955, mutual misgivings shaped a relationship that many years down the line would be referred to as ‘the most stable and durable element of China’s foreign relations.’³⁸ Prior to the establishment of the PRC, Pakistani Prime Minister Liaquat Ali Khan estimated that communist control of China simply meant the ‘increasing control of Moscow.’³⁹ That the Chinese ambassador in 1951 was received in Karachi airport by Soviet and Czech officials was telling.⁴⁰

The extent to which newly communist China would support Moscow was also a concern given Russia’s increasing contacts with King Zahir Shah in Afghanistan. Soviet leaders Nikita Khrushchev and Nikolai Bulganin’s visit to Kabul in December 1953 was at the very least alarming. They announced support for ‘Pakhtoonistan’ or the establishment of a Pashtun nation,⁴¹ a term and idea that is all but abhorred by Pakistan’s civilian and military leadership even in the present day. Further, and perhaps most important of all, Khwaja Nazimuddin and Mohammad Ali Bogra (Pakistan's second and third Prime Ministers respectively) were acutely aware of the strategic need to tread cautiously when it came to Communist China. After all, Pakistan not only entered into a Mutual Defence pact with the US in 1954 but subsequently also joined western backed military alliances designed to contain and even fight Communist forces.⁴² Consequently, Pakistan's initial and open support for the PRC's admission to the UN was soon muted. Instead, Pakistani envoys chose to support US-led resolutions to postpone China's representation in the UN. These were, in some respects, the very early stages of developing a balanced advance in Pakistan's relations with the US and China.

As mentioned above, the first noteworthy turning point in the relationship with China occurred in 1955 in Bandung, where Pakistani leaders attempted to balance their want to reach-out to China with their above-mentioned treaty obligations. To this end, Pakistan took the initiative to set the scene for what would turn out to be a critical summit in Indonesia. On 19 February 1955, Pakistani officials attended the inaugural meeting of what came to be called the South East Asia Treaty Organisation (SEATO) in Manila, along with other sponsoring nations including the US, the UK, and Australia. Astutely, and on that same day, the Pakistani ambassador in Peking met with Chinese officials. He unambiguously expressed Pakistan's desire for closer relations.⁴³ The need to work with the west in Manila was explained away as securing guarantees against Soviet –and not Chinese– expansion into parts of Asia.⁴⁴

Two months later in Bandung, Prime Minister Bogra made a clear distinction between China and the USSR, labelling the latter as 'imperialist'.⁴⁵ What raised Pakistan's ire was the fact that Russia, which abstained from votes to do with Kashmir in the UN Security Council between 1949 and 1953, changed tact to support India's case.⁴⁶ In two private sessions at Bandung between Bogra and Zhou, the former once again assured the Chinese premier that Pakistan's entry into military pacts sponsored principally by the US were not anti-Chinese.⁴⁷ Bogra went as far as to tell Zhou that Pakistan would 'never militarily participate' in an attack against China. Much to Bogra's surprise, Zhou went public with these assurances. It would seem that Bogra, who British officials believed was 'more understanding of motor cars and cameras than of politics' was politically used by the likes of Zhou.⁴⁸ The idea for Zhou, as later confirmed by Chinese officials, was to wean Pakistan slowly away from SEATO. Going public with Pakistani assurances at Bandung was meant to frustrate Pakistan's relations with the US and the West more broadly.⁴⁹ Chinese leaders like Marshall Ho Lung – one of the PRC's 'Ten Marshalls' appointed in 1955, made it their mission to actively increase 'the distance between the United States and Pakistan'.⁵⁰ In this, Lung had the full support of the CCP.⁵¹ As much as Pakistan sought to engage China, Chinese leaders too grew interested in the potential offered by a nation considered as a foe by India.

Following the private sessions in Bandung, Zhou's statement in the political committee of the conference on 23 April was telling, and it is worth recounting in part. He said:

'The day before yesterday, after lunch, I paid a visit to the Prime Minister of Pakistan. He told me that although Pakistan was a party to a military treaty, Pakistan was not against China. Pakistan had no fear China would commit aggression against her. As a result of that, we achieved a mutual understanding although we are still against military treaties. The Prime Minister of Pakistan further assured that if the United States should take aggressive action under the military treaty or if the United States launched a global war, Pakistan would not be involved in it.⁵²

Zhou's public announcement was, according to British sources, repeated by him in private to his own delegation. The bottom-line, according to these messengers was that 'Pakistan would never fight China.'⁵³ This was, to an extent, a crucial moment in the development of Sino-Pakistani relations.

In line with this newfound spirit of friendship, Pakistani Prime Minister Huseyn Suhrawardy visited China in October 1956. This was the first such visit by a senior leader since Pakistani independence. Selective accounts –notably by Suhrawardy's own cousin– suggest that this was a game-changing trip.⁵⁴ It carried a great deal of symbolic value – followed in turn by Zhou's state visit to Pakistan in December 1956. Chinese officials, according to Indian 'sources' in Karachi, argued that the visit was clearly designed to 'cultivate' China and this, these 'sources' confirmed, 'was all to the good' as far as Zhou was concerned.⁵⁵ Suhrawardy met twice with Mao and four times with Zhou. Much like Bogra in Bandung, the Pakistani Prime Minister did not hesitate to tell his hosts that Pakistan's membership to SEATO was not aimed at China. Pakistan 'entered into these alliances,' Suhrawardy now argued, 'because of the fear of India.'⁵⁶

Further, the visit had much to do with the need to secure Chinese support on Kashmir.⁵⁷ A disappointing set of exchanges with Nehru earlier in the year convinced Bogra that the Pakistani demand of holding a plebiscite in Kashmir was unlikely to attract either Indian or international (mainly American) attention.⁵⁸ Khrushchev and Bulganin's visit to India –and specifically to Kashmir– in 1955 made certain to both Bogra and Suhrawardy that Soviet support lay with India. Tellingly, and whilst in India, the Soviet leaders highlighted that 'the Kashmiri question had already been solved by the Kashmiri people themselves.'⁵⁹ There was no need for a plebiscite, a key Pakistani demand. In a meeting with both Bulganin and Khrushchev, Nehru did not hesitate to note that 'he was grateful for the statements made by the Soviet leaders.'⁶⁰ Predictably, these developments did little to entice Pakistan. Feeble attempts to turn Soviet opinion away from India had failed too.⁶¹

It was at this time that the Pakistani Ministry of Foreign Affairs informally asked their counterparts in Peking to –for the first time– clarify China's position on Kashmir. The answer was simple. For the time being, officials in Peking made clear; their view was not very different to that shared by the Soviet's. However, the difference was that unlike their Soviet counterparts, Chinese officials refused to publicly air their position. This left Pakistan with a window of opportunity to change China's disposition.⁶² Suhrawardy's visit was to serve as the first major attempt at doing exactly this. The timing was ripe. China's relations with India had become increasingly fractious. By 1956, Chinese maps, as Nehru nervously pointed out to his trusted advisors, began to show 'parts of our [Indian] territory as being part of the Chinese state.'⁶³ Further, a visit by the Dalai Lama to India in 1956 aggravated those like Zhou and other members of the CCP. Suhrawardy sought to take 'full advantage of the situation.'⁶⁴

For their part, Indian officials were largely unaware of the slow but effective development of the Sino-Pakistani relationship. Officials were instead focussed on China's cartographic representation of Eastern India as a part of China. The idea that China might in time find an ally in Pakistan was considered somewhat far-fetched.⁶⁵ In fact, for India, Bandung was hailed as a grand success. 'China,' according to the then

Indian Foreign Secretary –Subimal Dutt– ‘showed herself reasonable and accommodating.’ An eight-page note drafted by Dutt after the conference said nothing about Sino-Pakistani cooperation.⁶⁶ During talks with Bogra on the side-lines of the Commonwealth Relations Conference in London in July 1956, Nehru did not once mention China.⁶⁷ By the end of 1956, Pakistani leaders were convinced that friendship with China offered strategic opportunities unfound in the relationship with either the US or the USSR. Suhrawardy was equally perturbed by the Eisenhower administration, which grew wary of playing the part of an arbiter between India and Pakistan. The following period between 1956 and 1960 was about Pakistan actively finding space between its treaty obligations within SEATO and its need for greater Chinese support. As the then Japanese ambassador to Pakistan relayed to his Indian counterpart in Karachi, the ‘flirtation with a rival’ – read China, ‘is the most effective way of exciting the jealousy or reinforcing the affection of one’s own friend,’ or the West. That Pakistan actively sought to balance its relations between the PRC and the US was noted by other Japanese diplomats who at the time understood China better than most.⁶⁸

Yet, it would be a while before the Bogra-Zhou exchange at Bandung and the Suhrawardy-Zhou visits would lead to anything concrete. A quick tilt towards China could lead to expulsion from an alliance system –SEATO– created to guard against ‘communist aggression.’⁶⁹ Further, whilst Chinese support on Kashmir mattered to officials like Suhrawardy, others in the Pakistani Ministry of Foreign Affairs were concerned about alienating America and Britain by swinging too openly in favour of China. They also reminded Suhrawardy that pressure from the west on India was far more valuable than that from China. Bureaucrats in Pakistan understood that their leaders’ immediate fascination with Zhou and Mao could in turn alienate those in the western alliance that had materially (by way of the transfer of military hardware) done more for Pakistan than China could or wanted to for the time being. In fact, the political benefits of working with the west, according to such officials, far outweighed an open tilt in favour of China. This point was brought home to Pakistani leaders following a SEATO meeting in Karachi in March 1956. In a Joint Communiqué, the eight signatories to the Treaty (including the US, the UK and Australia) highlighted the Kashmir dispute.⁷⁰ This enraged India, but did well to remind Pakistani leaders of the obvious advantages in remaining a willing partner inside SEATO.⁷¹ As for Mao and Zhou, they were both unconvinced that Pakistan’s civilian leadership had what it took to break with the west in favour of China.⁷² More importantly, Pakistan needed to reconcile its own position with regards to Tibet and Taiwan before the opening with China could be exploited to its full potential.

1.2. Tibet, Taiwan, and an Offer

On 27 October 1958, General Mohammad Ayub Khan removed President Iskander Mirza –who did away with the 1956 Pakistani constitution– from office in what was largely a bloodless coup. Ayub joined the Indian army in 1928, and notably, is the only Pathan to have held the highest office within the Pakistani Army. He was not someone of the ‘highest intellectual class’, as those who knew him confessed,⁷³ but was astute enough to explore strategic opportunities with China. China too was keen to work with a new leader. In fact, towards the end of Suhrawardy’s reign, Mao was convinced that he ‘was a stooge of the western powers.’⁷⁴ Ayub on the other hand exuded confidence. He made clear from the outset that his regime wanted ‘to draw closer to [the] Commonwealth and the west generally,’ but also explored possibilities with Peking more aggressively than before.⁷⁵ At first however, disagreements over the fate of Tibet and a tentative rapprochement offered to the GMD-run government in Taiwan would do little to realise such possibilities.

On 22 September 1958, in the midst of the Second Taiwan Straights Crisis that pitted Mainland China and Taiwan in a military conflict, a note from Peking demanded that Pakistan clarify its position. A week later, the Pakistani Foreign Affairs Ministry cautiously replied. Pakistan, it argued, 'had neither given de facto or de jure recognition to the government in Taiwan.' 'The juridical position,' the note stated, 'of Formosa is not clear.' Hence, it concluded, the problem should be 'settled by peaceful negotiations.'⁷⁶ Apart from the ambiguously phrased note that did little to persuade officials in Peking, was that a little more than a year later Pakistan hosted what came to be called the 'Chinese Moslem Haji Mission.' It was headed by one of Chiang Kai-Shek's deputies. The mission was on its way to Mecca and had been met by the Pakistani Foreign Secretary as it disembarked in Karachi. Unsurprisingly, Zhou authorised a strongly worded protest note. It made clear that Pakistan's 'two China' policy blatantly supported the US and SEATO position on Taiwan.' 'By continuing to do so,' it firmly stated, Pakistan would have to 'bear full responsibility for all damage thus done to the Sino-Pakistani relationship.'⁷⁷

As problematic as Pakistan's stand on Taiwan was her position with regards to Tibet. Following the rebellion in Lhasa in March 1959, Pakistan adopted a strident if not bold approach. On 20 October, having co-sponsored a draft resolution on Tibet, the Pakistani delegation at the UN feverishly argued that the 'attempt to change the traditional way of life of the Tibetan people' was essentially 'a violation of their fundamental human rights.' It strongly recommended garnering 'world public opinion' to assist Tibetan's in their struggle.⁷⁸ Ayub publicly stated that the 'Chinese occupation of Tibet' and other construction activities on its border with Afghanistan constituted a 'threat' that could not be 'overlooked by wishful thinking.' This was hardly, according to Zhou, how friendships developed.⁷⁹ Unlike Bogra and Surawardy, Ayub was less interested in pleasing China as he was in convincing Chinese leaders that Pakistan was a nation that understood the importance of leverage in international politics.

What also pushed Ayub into such tough talk was the fact that by September 1959, Chinese maps began showing parts of Pakistan's north and north-eastern border regions as belonging to the PRC.⁸⁰ These outlying territories had been a focus of the PLA from at least the beginning of 1953. An attempt by Pakistani paramilitary guards to mark the border was thwarted. As one British military advisor travelling in those parts recalled: the 'marks made were obliterated' by the PLA, which had a post in the area.⁸¹ Ayub was convinced that the PRC would do what was necessary to occupy territory in Pakistan controlled Kashmir. Negotiations, according to him, were necessary. As he put it: 'the sole purpose [of the border discussions] was to eliminate possible cause of conflict in the future.'⁸² Only a demarcation process, he told his advisors, could avoid further 'friction' in an area where Chinese patrols were regularly sighted.⁸³ A strong note on Tibet at the UN, it would seem, was Ayub's way of creating for Pakistan a degree of leverage to trade on the negotiating table with China.

For Ayub, China needed to realise that it was dealing with an equal in the international domain. Curiously, on 23 October 1959, only three days after Pakistan's raucous appeal at the UN, Ayub told his Cabinet that Pakistan and China would soon enter into talks to demarcate and delimit the border. Tibet was no longer a matter of discussion for Pakistani officials at the UN. Mao finally found a noteworthy counterpart in Pakistan.

However, unlike a few years before, this time China found it increasingly difficult to take advantage of the opening presented by Ayub. Shocked and then occupied by the Dalai Lama's escape –assisted by the CIA– to India in March 1959,⁸⁴ the focus for Mao and most other Chinese leaders turned squarely on the problem with India.⁸⁵ What irked the Chinese leadership more was that they suspected Indian support for US trained Tibetan insurgent fighter's air dropped into Tibet to fight the PLA.⁸⁶ The period between 1959 and the end of 1960 saw little development in the Sino-Pakistani relationship. The stage had been set. The troubles around Tibet and Taiwan had been settled. Mao and Zhou found a formidable ally in Ayub. What was now needed was an impetus for both China and Pakistan to accommodate their respective strategic needs and realise a friendship that would outlast these leaders.

2. An opportunity in War: 1960 to 1963

Ayub Khan's congratulatory letter –following the US presidential elections in November 1960– to President John F. Kennedy was littered with hints groping for assurances. Aware of the incoming Democratic administrations stated aim to improve ties with 'neutrals' like India, Ayub stressed that he and the 'people of Pakistan' were determined to keep the 'godless creed' of communism away from its borders. Instead, Ayub maintained that the 'destiny' of his country 'lies in friendship with the United States.' He did not fail to mention that it was hence in the 'supreme interest of the west' to sustain this friendship.⁸⁷ In fact, what developed between 1960 and the fall of 1963 was engagement along parallel tracks: of gaining assurances from the west about their support for Pakistan over India and at the same time of exploring and then realising opportunities with China.

2.1. A Deal

The first real attempt to reach-out to China in this period came from a relatively younger member of Ayub's Cabinet. Thirty-two years of age, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto led the Pakistani delegation to the fifteenth General Assembly in New York in October 1960. Unconvinced by the merits of supporting postponement motions in the case of China's admission to the UN, Bhutto chose to abstain from the US sponsored resolution. Whether this was done with or without Ayub's support is unclear. Indeed, Bhutto was mildly rebuked by Foreign Minister Manzur Qadir, who argued that for the time being and if forced to choose between China and the US, Pakistan had little option but to be 'friendly with the west.'⁸⁸ The Foreign Ministry was less inclined to engage in a high stakes game especially at a time when the Kennedy administration seemed more convinced about the need to engage India. This notwithstanding, Bhutto opened the pathway for further negotiations with China. At some level, the tension between the Foreign Ministry's desire to play-it-safe and remain squarely in the western quarter, and Bhutto and Ayub's want to balance Pakistan's advance in foreign policy by befriending China did well, at least for the time being, to check and then develop relations with both the US and China

During visits to Washington, other members of the Cabinet remained ambiguous about Pakistan's willingness to reach a settlement with Peking. In one meeting, Mohamed Shoaib –the Pakistani Finance Minister– laughed off the suggestion made by Kennedy that the opening with China was 'only to bring pressure on India.'⁸⁹ In fact, and at least in part, it was to bring pressure on the US and Kennedy in particular to actively support Pakistan's case with regards to Kashmir at the UN. The Indian ambassador in Washington –B. K. Nehru– was well aware of Pakistan’s game-play. In a whole series of correspondences between January 1961 and till the outbreak of war with China in October 1962, the younger ambassador was ordered by M. J. Desai –the Indian Foreign Secretary– to push-back any suggestion of an UN-led discussion on Kashmir. Instead, and as Prime Minister Nehru put it to Kennedy: ‘the only effective way of arriving at a mutually satisfactory solution,’ according to India at least, was to ‘follow the method of direct negotiations and discussions.’⁹⁰ At the time, India was in a position to make such demands. There was little Kennedy could do but adhere to Nehru’s craftily worded disapproval. None of this was lost on Ayub.

On a visit to Washington in July 1961 and increasingly aware of disagreements between Zhou and Nehru over the contested Sino-Indian border,⁹¹ Ayub continued to press Kennedy for assurances he had worked so hard for. Kennedy agreed to ‘talk with President Ayub first’ if America was to provide military assistance to India. Ayub shrewdly chose to stay clear of any discussion around Pakistan’s own border with China or Bhutto’s decision to abstain from the vote at the UN.⁹² At the same time, and aware of how his US visit might be read in Peking, Ayub sent feelers through Mohammed Ikramullah –Pakistan’s first Foreign Secretary– to the Chinese embassy in Karachi. Reportedly, Ikramullah told Chinese officials: ‘we don’t agree with your maps, how about setting them right.’ In January, 1961, Foreign Minister Qadir was heard stating that the Chinese were in ‘principle’ agreeable to an agreement.⁹³

Taking advantage of the informal momentum built-up by his emissaries, Ayub met with the Chinese ambassador in Karachi not long after he returned from the US. The PRC, it was made clear to Ayub, wanted a seat at the UN. Tired of its over-reliance on the Soviet Union, with which it was embroiled in all sorts of controversies, Zhou wanted Chinese envoys to make their own case at the UN free from the clutches of gatekeepers and antagonists alike. The timing could not have been more opportune. As one Pakistani official in London argued, the view in Karachi was that China was in a ‘soft mood for a settlement.’⁹⁴ It was not that the Pakistani vote in itself mattered. Rather that it would help –even if ever so slightly– the PRC make its case for a Permanent Seat in the Security Council. Ayub once again made an offer to discuss the demarcation of Pakistan’s borders in the north. Of course for Ayub, these negotiations were only a means by which friendship with the PRC could be forged and later strengthened. Hesitant at first, the Chinese ambassador soon adhered. The deal was simple: Pakistan’s vote in exchange for a Chinese agreement to demarcate the border. In 1961 Pakistan voted in favour of the PRC’s admission to the UN, a task finally achieved a decade later in 1971.

Shortly after Pakistan’s changed position at the UN, Pakistani officials openly stated that they were tasked to find a solution to their border issues with China. India was aware that a Pakistani delegation visited Peking to discuss the border.⁹⁵ According to Qadir, Nehru had been shown the disputed maps by Ayub during his visit to Pakistan in 1960. He ‘had not seemed unduly disturbed,’ Qadir told Walter McConaughy, the US ambassador to Pakistan.⁹⁶ In turn, Nehru made clear to John Kenneth Galbraith, the US envoy in New Delhi, that the deal was designed by China to simply demonstrate the ‘unreasonableness of India.’⁹⁷ In fact, Nehru got it wrong. Ayub and his envoys made it seem as though China was keen on the deal at this given time, when in fact it was he who decided the timetable for talks. The Canadian mission in Karachi picked this up, and in a detailed note on the border agreement distributed to all ‘friendly’ states, it underlined that the ‘initiative’ came from the ‘Pakistan side.’⁹⁸

The advance, it would seem, was to make clear to both Washington and London that providing military assistance to India in the near future could lead to the expansion of what American officials liked to call Pakistan's 'flirtatiousness' with China. What of course helped Ayub pursue this line was the US's 'official silence on the subject.'⁹⁹ British Foreign Office mandarins too urged Whitehall to 'resist any attempt' by India to draw the UK into a dispute over the Sino-Pakistani border if she chose to make it one.¹⁰⁰ Nehru chose not to. The primary objection as far as he was concerned was that the territory under negotiation between Pakistan and China lay on disputed territory in Pakistan administered Kashmir. The Indian Ministry of External Affairs argued –and has done so since– that this 'constitutes[d] an inalienable part of the Indian Union.'¹⁰¹ A protest note was sent to all parties including the UN.¹⁰²

With a relatively free hand, Ayub sought to maintain a carefully constructed balance between Pakistan's need to remain within the western alliance whilst working to strengthen relations with the PRC. The outbreak of war in October 1962 and the Indian demand for western military assistance emboldened Ayub's long held demand to strike a deal on Kashmir. That Ayub got his way with Kennedy –at least initially– and was also able to finalise a border agreement with China was a result of a carefully crafted diplomatic approach that made optimum use of the opportunity at hand: a war between India and China, as demonstrated in the narrative below.

2.2. War and the Making of the Sino-Pakistan Border Agreement

The first serious armed contact between Indian and Chinese troops took place on 10 October 1962. Ten days later, the PLA's campaign began in full force. Within a week of battle, some twenty-one Indian army posts were under Chinese occupation.¹⁰³ Nehru requested just about every 'friendly' head of state for military assistance.¹⁰⁴ Kennedy, the prime target of Nehru's letters of appeal, needed little convincing. Without consulting Ayub, and ignoring a promise Kennedy had made to the Pakistani President in July 1961,¹⁰⁵ the first shipment of American-made military supplies left American shores. They reached the eastern city of Calcutta on 3 November 1962.

What 'personally hurt' Ayub more was that Americans pushed Pakistan to make conciliatory gestures to India at a time it faced a military threat from Communist China.¹⁰⁶ The Field Marshall grew almost vindictive. He rallied behind a line that had become all-too-common to western audiences. Indians, he wrote to Kennedy, remain 'hostile to Pakistan.' An assurance that Pakistan would not threaten Indian interests 'can only be done,' he pointedly argued, 'if there is a settlement of the question of Kashmir.'¹⁰⁷ A letter from Nehru guaranteeing that American-sponsored equipment 'would not be used for any purpose' other than against the Chinese did nothing for Ayub.¹⁰⁸ Following the delivery of the first tranche of US military supplies to India on 3 November, Ayub told both American and British officials that such equipment may enlarge the conflict. He was convinced that China did not want to invade India. Rather, he argued that India was using the opportunity presented by the Chinese attack to secure military assistance from the west that could in turn be used against Pakistan. A national protest day against US aid to India was organised on 16 November 1962, to little effect.

To an extent, US National Security Council staffers appreciated Pakistani anxieties. Robert Komer –better known for his expertise on Vietnam– argued that the Pakistani's were going through a 'genuine emotional crisis,' in that their 'cherished ambitions' of using the US as a 'lever' against India 'was going up in the smoke of the Chinese border war.'¹⁰⁹ Envoys posted in South Asia were less forgiving. Galbraith immediately understood what the Pakistani's were suggesting –in their efforts to force India to discuss Kashmir– could be read as nothing less than a 'form of blackmail.' He also noted how Pakistani envoys did not miss a chance to 'make pro-Chinese noises.'¹¹⁰ Furthermore, Pakistan and China entered formal negotiations on 12 October. Ayub's advance, as outlined above, might not have pleased the likes of Galbraith, but it was beginning to yield results. In fact, the negotiations themselves were kept secret. For instance, on 25 October, Duncan Sandys –the British Commonwealth Secretary– met with Bogra. The latter fervently argued that 'Chinese aggression against India constituted a common threat to the whole subcontinent.'¹¹¹ The parallel track advance of keeping Britain and the US onside whilst quietly engaging China was in the works.

On 21 November, the PRC announced a unilateral ceasefire. By 1 December, the PLA consolidated its occupation of the Aksai Chin in Indian administered Kashmir. Its forces moved twenty kilometres behind the McMahon Line or the disputed border between India's North Eastern region and Tibet. Throughout the conflict Ayub unhesitatingly argued that the primary Chinese aim was to take 'control of the Sinkiang road and a certain part of Ladakh,' which lay in the Aksai Chin area.¹¹² He reiterated this to Sandy's and Averell Harriman –the American Ambassador to the UN– during their nine-day visit to India and Pakistan in November 1962. Immediately after the ceasefire was called, Foreign Minister Bogra did not miss the chance to tell McConaughy that although Pakistan and China were like 'oil and water,' there was 'some natural advantage' in engaging Beijing.¹¹³

Veiled threats like these served as a convincer for the Anglo-American team already determined to find a way to balance India's need for further military assistance with Ayub's demands for talks. Nehru hesitatingly agreed. Six rounds of talks on Kashmir were to begin on 26 December. What of course McConaughy, Sandy's, Harriman, and Galbraith did not know was that Pakistan had entered into official dialogue with China just as Indian positions were being overrun by the PLA. Following the Chinese call for a ceasefire, and whilst Sandy's pressed Bogra about Pakistan's dealings with China, the Pakistani foreign minister kept-up the twin track advance developed by Ayub. He 'laughed' and said 'there is no foundation whatsoever for this rumour,'¹¹⁴ all the while talking quietly with the Chinese. By the third week of December both Pakistan and China had reached an agreement. The Indian delegation to the first round of talks in Rawalpindi in December 1962 –led by the Indian Railways Minister Sardar Swaran Singh –learnt of the border agreement on Karachi radio on the evening of their arrival. Nothing could have shocked the Indians more.¹¹⁵ Galbraith and the US State department too were caught off guard. 'History can be idiotic,' Galbraith wrote in his journal. 'A staunch American ally against Communism,' he argued, 'is negotiating with the Chinese Communists to the discontent of an erstwhile neutral.'¹¹⁶ The Americans had no idea about the advanced stage of Sino-Pakistani negotiations.

The irony escaped no one. Not the least Swaran Singh, who realised that even under these dire and potentially embarrassing circumstances, the talks with Ayub's envoys –led by Bhutto– were a necessity if India wanted arms from abroad. Singh, British officials argued was 'anxious to make a serious attempt to negotiate.'¹¹⁷ Years later, Bhutto told Paul Gore-Booth –the British High Commissioner in New Delhi during the Border War – that the decision to go public with the Chinese deal was taken to test India's earnestness to talk about Kashmir and also place adequate pressure on Kennedy.¹¹⁸

Bhutto got his answer, and to his credit, did his part—at least during the first two rounds—to take the dialogue process as seriously as possible.¹¹⁹ What he of course did not tell western diplomats like Gore-Booth was that the decision to go public on the deal with China was potentially a part of a strategy designed and directed by Ayub. In fact, Ayub wasted no time whatsoever. He received the news from his envoy that an agreement in principle had been settled in Peking at 8.30 pm on 26 December.¹²⁰ Karachi radio carried the headline at 9.00 pm.¹²¹

2.3. The Sino-Pakistan Border Agreement

In a five-page document containing seven articles, both sides agreed to ‘formally delimit and demarcate the boundary between China’s Sinkiang and the contiguous areas.’¹²² As mentioned above, the signatures were exchanged a fortnight before the fourth round of talks between India and Pakistan were to proceed. British officials tried hard to convince Bhutto to forgo the visit to Peking to sign the agreement. It would have a ‘very bad effect on the current’ negotiation with India they stated.¹²³ In Washington, Pakistani ambassador Aziz Ahmed forcefully argued that his Ministry of Foreign Affairs ‘tried to call off the Bhutto visit but could not.’¹²⁴ Clearly, Bhutto was not proceeding in accordance with Ministry-led imperatives, but a carefully crafted timetable set by Ayub and potentially himself.¹²⁵ To be sure, the last leg of the Sino-Pakistani negotiations took place mainly in Peking and was led by Ayub’s trusted ambassador – Nawabzada Raza,¹²⁶ and not the erstwhile Foreign Minister Manzur Qadir as claimed by some.¹²⁷ In his autobiography, Altaf Gauhar confirms that ‘Ayub was playing a lone hand.’ His cabinet was ‘divided,’ which would explain the sequence of events highlighted immediately above.¹²⁸ This is largely confirmed by Booth’s own account of the negotiations.¹²⁹

The third and fourth round of the India-Pakistan talks in Karachi and Calcutta lasted only for a day-and-a-half each. Obsessed with Pakistani control over the Kashmir Valley, Bhutto disregarded any suggestion by the Indian team of accepting amendments along the Ceasefire Line (CFL) between Indian and Pakistan administered Kashmir. This, even when the Indian side was prepared to offer Pakistan 1,500 square miles of territory more than Pakistan had at the time.¹³⁰ The view in Karachi was shaped by an ‘increasing feeling of scepticism,’¹³¹ as British diplomats reported back to Whitehall. What helped fuel this sense of doubt in February 1963 was the fact that the temporary ban on sending arms and ammunition to India had been lifted.¹³² Clearly, the idea that supplies were dependent upon India’s willingness to negotiate a deal on Kashmir now mattered less to both Britain and America. In fact, following the first two rounds, Bhutto understood that India would not concede either the Kashmir Valley or even a part of it. This was a key Pakistani demand. Anything short of the Valley or large portions of it, Bhutto reasoned, would not be acceptable to either the National Assembly or the Pakistani public.¹³³

It is at this time that the decision seemed to have been taken to bring forward the signing—of the Sino-Pakistani border agreement—to March. If western military aid was to be given to India despite the continued deadlock on Kashmir, an agreement with China was thought to open alternative options that would more directly support Pakistani interests. Interestingly, and whilst both Kennedy and Macmillan were under the impression that Zhou was responsible for sabotaging the talks on Kashmir, in fact, according to Pakistani insiders, the ‘Chinese government wanted to move slowly.’¹³⁴ It was Ayub and Bhutto who chose to make the best of the opportunity at hand. They largely ignored the more cautious approach developed earlier by Bogra and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs more generally. The bureaucrats were largely kept in the dark. As mentioned above, the Pakistani ambassador to Peking – a political appointee, and not the Foreign Secretary, concluded the agreement. It was shared with the Ministry only as a matter of protocol after it had been completed.¹³⁵

Macmillan told Kennedy that he was aware of the ‘continual dangers in Ayub’s flirting with the Chinese,’ but that there was little he or the US President could do to ‘abandon’ the agreement.¹³⁶ Shortly after the treaty was finally signed, Kennedy made clear to Nehru that he could not ‘remake the past.’¹³⁷ The Sino-Pakistani deal was a reality, which, in US Secretary of State Dean Rusk’s estimation limited the US’s ‘leverage with the Indian’s.’¹³⁸ Rusk was right. Nehru well understood that the US could no longer pretend to be backing the demands of what turned out to be an insincere ally: Pakistan. In turn, Ayub was clear that Nehru was unwilling to budge when it came to the Valley. The fourth, fifth, and sixth rounds of the India-Pakistan talks finally ended on 16 May having made no headway whatsoever.¹³⁹

The Sino-Pakistani agreement itself was hardly earth shattering. The Chinese-claim line fell within parts of the former princely states of Hunza and Nagar, which acceded to Pakistan in 1947-48. It abutted Sinkiang to the north and the Wakhan Corridor to its west. A second area, Gilgit and Baltistan or what is known as the Northern Areas in the present time bordered Sinkiang to the north and Tibet to the east and were directly administered by Pakistan through two political agents. In the end, both Pakistan and China agreed to an Actual Line of Control based on the Karakoram watershed. Upon Pakistan’s request, Zhou conceded an area known as the Oprang Valley in Hunza, which was used by the people of Hunza for grazing. This was not Pakistani territory, and the Chinese agreed to withdraw from it. In the end, China received 2050 square miles and Pakistan was left with 1,350 square miles. Apart from the Oprang, other areas negotiated away were considered to be ‘inaccessible from the Pakistani side.’¹⁴⁰ In the end, once provided with the agreement, Pakistani bureaucrats – like Agha Shahi, the Director General in the Pakistani Ministry of Foreign Affairs was content with the agreement.¹⁴¹

The agreement even took into cognizance the fact that an Indian protest would follow. As mentioned above, India’s principle and immediate objection was that the territory ceded to China included parts of Pakistan administered Kashmir. This was disputed territory; Indian officials reasoned, and could not be bartered away. Hence, Nawabzada and his Chinese interlocutors made room for an Article –Six– that made clear that following the ‘settlement of the Kashmir dispute’ China would reopen negotiations with the ‘sovereign authority concerned.’¹⁴² In many ways, not only did the timing of the negotiations work well for Ayub, but the final outcome was more than acceptable to Pakistan. It would be highly unlikely, Ayub understood, that India and Pakistan would be able settle their differences hence leaving the agreement with the PRC intact.

In the end, the negotiations leading up to the agreement and the final treaty laid the foundation of a friendship like none other for both Pakistan and China. This is not to say, as the following and last section of this article underscores, that the relationship forged in 1963 has always yielded results in the way Pakistan would have liked, but in some form and shape remains a key guarantee against both India and the west’s oscillatory policies. In fact, soon after the treaty was signed, the previously cautious Pakistani policy towards China, apparent in the period between 1949 and 1960, changed. In a survey of Pakistani foreign office officials and air force officers conducted in 1965 by Alistair Buchan – the founding director of what was then the Institute of Strategic Studies in London, Pakistan’s once watchful position towards China was replaced with blanket admiration. The view from Islamabad and Rawalpindi was clear, reported

Buchan, 'China is not a threat to her neighbours. ... She is a prudent country with certain legitimate requirements of coexistence but without an expansionist philosophy despite her ideological fervour.'¹⁴³

3. Conclusion: Friendship in Times of War and Peace

According to a survey conducted in 2014, China had a 'favourability' rating within Pakistan of 78 percent, higher than any other country in Asia and twenty-seven points higher than the US.¹⁴⁴ From the outset, the poll made clear that Buchan's estimation in 1965 stood the test of time. Admittedly, surveys and polls are at best indicative of popular sentiment of those polled. Indeed, in the fifty-odd years since the Sino-Pakistani Border agreement was signed, Chinese support for Pakistan and the 'all weather friendship' has been less than clear-cut. Yet, and without doubt, as the author of a recent book on Sino-Pakistani relations contends, friendship is 'the one commodity that Pakistan can offer China more convincingly than any other country.'¹⁴⁵ As this concluding section underlines, while China has refused to provide military and even political support for Pakistan in times of war with India, it has in fact been a friend to Pakistan in a way that more-than-matters to Pakistani elites. The quick shift in Chinese positions in times of war between India and Pakistan in the last half-century illustrates the limitations of this friendship. Equally, Beijing's support in times of peace makes clear the importance of a friendship that neither India nor the US can ignore or even underestimate. In the final analysis, the benefits of the 'all weather friendship' are without doubt.

On 5 August 1965, Pakistani regular soldiers dressed like mujahedeen fighters crossed the CFL that divides Indian and Pakistani administered Kashmir. It was the beginning of a clandestine Operation known as Gibraltar. The idea was simple: to encourage those in Indian administered Kashmir to revolt against the local government and call for independence. The plot was quickly foiled.¹⁴⁶ Within a week, Indian security and intelligence officials were able to successfully arrest Pakistani regulars disguised as mujahedeen fighters. The fighting escalated with regular Pakistani troops manoeuvring to cut-off parts of Indian administered Kashmir. On 6 September, the Indian army crossed the International Border, opening a second front. As Indian regiments moved close to Lahore in Pakistani Punjab, Ayub reached-out to China for help. In fact, according to John Garver, Chinese leaders were 'consulted extensively' during the planning stages of Operation Gibraltar. Days before India opened the second front, the Chinese Foreign Minister –during a brief visit to Karachi– stated that China 'firmly supports Pakistan's just action in hitting back at armed Indian provocation.' A few days later the Pakistani ambassador in Peking was categorically told that if India entered East Pakistan, then China would seek to militarily intervene. With the view to place pressure on the Indian government and military forces, Zhou authored a note on 19 September warning India that it must dismantled its military infrastructure in the eastern border with Tibet, otherwise 'bear full responsibility for all the grave consequences arising therefrom.'¹⁴⁷

The administration of US President Lyndon B. Johnson was convinced that the Chinese threat made to India was real. In fact, following Kennedy's funeral in 1963 Johnson reluctantly met with Bhutto –who was sent by Ayub to represent Pakistan– and warned the Foreign Minister that Pakistan's advance with China would not be tolerated in Washington. Officials like Undersecretary of State George Ball told the President that he 'deeply distrusted' Bhutto. He had, as Kux recounts, 'persistently undercut' US interests according to Ball.¹⁴⁸ In 1965 however, the benefits of Pakistan's 'flirtatiousness' with China was more-than-clear to both Bhutto and Ayub. Indian Prime Minister Lal Bahadur

Shastri –who took office following Nehru’s demise in 1964– confessed to the American ambassador in India –Chester Bowles– that ‘these thoughts [around the Chinese threat] were very much on his mind’ as he discussed plans to evict the Pakistani army from Indian administered Kashmir.¹⁴⁹ So convincing was the Chinese threat in support of Pakistan that in the midst of the crisis, Robert Komer pointedly told Johnson that the PLA’s involvement would mean that the ‘whole Western power position in Asia may be at risk.’ The support to Pakistan from the likes of Zhou was ‘firm,’ according to Komer. It was for these reasons, he argued, that the US would need to work with the USSR to force an UN-backed ceasefire as soon as possible.¹⁵⁰ On 22 September, India accepted such a proposal. The war ended. For his part, Ayub did not fail to tell his people that ‘the moral support which the Chinese government extended to us [Pakistan]...will forever remain enshrined in our hearts.’¹⁵¹ The ‘all weather friendship’ had clearly paid-off, especially at a time when the Johnson administration was almost fully occupied with an impending war in Vietnam.¹⁵² This is not to over-estimate the role played by China during the war, but to simply make the point that the ‘friendship’ did place significant pressure on the US. Further, it made clear to India that there were limits to what the Indian army could do inside Pakistan and in Pakistan administered Kashmir. This was clearly an important factor for no less a figure than the Indian Prime Minister.

Yet, that such support was so readily available in 1965 was not something that could be taken for granted. Ayub’s successor –Yahya Khan– learnt this bitter lesson during the 1971 War. The war led to the loss of East Pakistan and the creation of the independent state of Bangladesh. The fight for linguistic and economic rights amongst the majority Bangla speaking population in East Pakistan can be traced to the early 1950s. By 1969, a six-point plan for greater autonomy had been submitted by the Awami League to West Pakistani elites. The Awami’s victory in the 1970 General Election was not only surprising, but also unacceptable to those like Bhutto – who had launched his own party in the west. The inability to find a political solution on the part of Yahya, Bhutto, and the Awami leadership led to a crackdown in the East forcing many Awami leaders into India. Moreover, by August 1971, close to ten million East-Pakistani refugees were living in India’s less stable North Eastern regions. For Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, it was clear that something needed to be done. The failure of diplomatic efforts and the difficulty in mobilising world opinion ultimately led to war. For the Nixon administration, Yahya, as is well known, was a key actor who helped broker Henry Kissinger’s secret visit to China in the summer of 1971.¹⁵³ Supporting Yahya was seen as prudent policy for both Nixon and Kissinger.¹⁵⁴ This notwithstanding, the Nixon White House could do little more than strongly critique Gandhi’s decision to invade East Pakistan. Only when it looked like India might escalate the War in the western frontier across Kashmir did the US send parts of the seventh fleet as a warning to New Delhi.¹⁵⁵

For Pakistan, active Chinese military support was of paramount importance. The hope was that much like in 1965, Zhou and Mao might mobilise the PLA and thereby place Indian troops on alert and hence divide Indian forces in the Eastern frontier. Such support, Yahya’s envoys realised was unavailable. During a visit to Beijing on 5 November 1971, a month before war broke-out, Bhutto and Foreign Secretary Sultan Khan had met with Zhou. Unlike in 1965, the Chinese Premier was reserved. India was well armed and better equipped than in 1965. Most passes into Eastern India were inaccessible in the winter months, making Chinese manoeuvres all the more difficult. Further, there was little political appetite to threaten war with India over an issue that was largely of Pakistan’s making. Foreign Minister Ji Pengfei had long asked Yahya to find a ‘reasonable settlement’ in the East. Lastly, an Indo-Soviet Treaty of Friendship – signed on 9 August 1971— served, as something of a deterrent to China should the Soviet's chose to militarily support India.¹⁵⁶ At the end of Bhutto's trip, he argued that 'Pakistan can hope for little from China.'¹⁵⁷ For Pakistan, it was clear that Chinese support was conditional. China did provide much needed military equipment to Pakistan at a time that US supplies were largely lacking, but there was a line that had been drawn by Chinese leaders of how far they would go to assist their 'all weather' friend.¹⁵⁸ Further, the only guarantee hazily provided by Pakistan's friends, the US and China was that they would potentially intervene if Indian forces crossed the border into West Pakistan. However, for Gandhi, this was never a part of the plan as attested by notes written by her following the war.¹⁵⁹

Nearly three decades later in 1999, the government of Nawaz Sharif better understood the limitations of Chinese support. He was more taken aback by the single condition imposed on him by President Bill Clinton: to withdraw his forces from Indian administered Kashmir. Following a well-planned incursion in an area known as Kargil in Indian administered Kashmir, Indian armed forces were mobilised. The objective was to vacate Pakistani regulars —dressed, much like in 1965, as mujahedeen fighters— from key points that had been left vacant by the Indian army in the winter months. In fact, vacating such territories was a custom followed by both armies, one that had been cunningly betrayed by the new Pakistani Chief of Army Staff General Pervez Musharraf. Unlike in the past, this 'limited war,' as it is popularly referred to, was fought in the backdrop of the existence of nuclear weapons. Clinton and his close advisors intervened almost immediately. Pakistan, as far as the US president was concerned was on the wrong, and he made this clear to Sharif during a visit to Washington on 5 July 1999. Equally, Beijing had made clear to Musharraf that Chinese military and even political support was out of the question. Pakistan was on it's own. In the end, US diplomatic pressure persuaded Sharif and then Musharraf to withdraw their forces, but not before the Indian army had managed to take back the occupied positions.¹⁶⁰ For Brajesh Misra, India's National Security Advisor, it was clear that Chinese interference was less likely. Only if the Indian army decided to follow suite and enter Pakistan administered Kashmir, he argued, would the Indians have to worry about China. This, however, was far from India's calculations in 1999.¹⁶¹ American support for India during the Kargil War was unprecedented. A US President had clearly condemned Pakistani actions. It was a time that Pakistan and especially Musharraf needed China the most.

The two episodes in 1971 and 1999 clarify that for China, direct military involvement in an India-Pakistan standoff is highly unlikely. However, and as both Gandhi and Misra understood, Chinese reactions in the event where India takes military initiative in Pakistan administered Kashmir is hardly clear-cut. Further, the advantages of the 'all weather friendship' are clearer in peacetime. China has consistently played a central role in helping Pakistan grow its nuclear arsenal and military industrial complex. Following the withdrawal of US-led forces from Afghanistan in 2014 and the end of large amounts of military and economic assistance to Pakistan, China stepped-in. It invested close to $46 billion in what is widely known as the China-Pakistan-Economic-Corridor or CPEC. Further, and as importantly, China has actively blocked India's application to become a full member of the Nuclear Supplier's Group (NSG), unless Pakistan is also made a full member. It has also used its veto effectively to disallow terrorists wanted by India —but who live in Pakistan and direct attacks against India— to be placed on the UN's sanctions list.¹⁶²

It would be a mistake to assume that non-intervention in past and perhaps future wars undermines the importance of this unique friendship. The fruits of Ayub, Bhutto, Bogra and Suhrawardy's labour are more than clear in the present. Pakistan's triangular diplomacy with both China and the US might not have always worked in its favour –as was abundantly clear in 1971 and 1999, but, it has still been able to rely on China on matters that are as crucial for Pakistan's economy and security interests. As Misra argued, 'Chinese calculations cannot be underestimated when it comes to dealing with Pakistan.'¹⁶³ That these calculations place certain limits on Indian diplomacy, even if not on military action, provides a degree of leverage that is crucial in Pakistan's advance in the present. This is especially moot given the souring of relations between Pakistan and the US during President Barack Obama's final years in office.¹⁶⁴ The fact that Pakistan has options apart from the US was made possible because of the wisdom and cunning of its leaders who in the 1950s and early 1960s took advantage of opportunities –such as the 1962 Sino-Indian War– as they presented themselves. This article provides a more complete account of their story; one that began only months after the PRC came into being in October 1949.

Notes

¹ The author would like to thank the anonymous reviewer for the detailed comments and critique. Further, the author thanks and expresses his deep appreciation to the following for reading drafts of the paper and/or offering their valuable insights: Jack Gill, Amit Dasgupta, Lorenz Luthi, Srinath Raghavan and David Engerman.

² CRO to JIC, 6 March. 1963, [Kew, United Kingdom National Archives; hereafter NA]

[Commonwealth Relations Office] DO 196/130.

³ The disputed frontier of Kashmir, 20 November. 1962, [Maryland, The National Archive, College Park, hereafter TNA] [Assessed on the CIA-managed CREST system, hereafter CREST] CIA/RR (62-9).

⁴ The disputed frontier of Kashmir, 20 November. 1962, CIA/RR (62-9).

⁵ Note: Emphasis added. For a detailed account of the First Kashmir War see: Srinath Raghavan, War and Peace in Modern India (New Delhi: Permanent Black, 2010), 137-146.

⁶ See: Paul M. McGarr, The Cold War in South Asia: Britain, the United States and the Indian Subcontinent, 1941-1065 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 2013), 149-183.

⁷ For a summary see: Howard B. Schaffer, The Limits of Influence: America's Role in Kashmir (Washington DC: Brookings Institution Press, 2009), 75-79.

⁸ For a detailed examination of Pakistan's defence relationship with the US prior to 1962 see: Dennis Kux, The United States and Pakistan 1947-2000 (Washington DC: Woodrow Wilson Centre Press, 2001), 86-130.

⁹ 'Speech by Chen Yi,' 3 March, 1963 cited in: R. K. Jain (ed), China-South Asia relations, 1947-1980 (London: Harvester Press, 1981), 37-38.

¹⁰ 'Chou En-lai to Associated Press,' Ibid.

¹¹ For a brief analysis of Pakistan and India's relationship with the west since 1962 see: Bruce Riedel, JFKs Forgotten Crisis: Tibet, The CIA, And the Sino-Indian War (Washington DC: Brookings Institution Press, 2015), 168-182.

¹² John Kenneth Galbraith, Ambassadors Journal: A Personal Account of the Kennedy Years (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1969), 138-237 and Paul Gore-Booth, With Great Truth and Respect (London: Constable, 1974), 262-292.

¹³ Note: The latest scholarship on the subject provides little on the development of Sino-Pakistani relationship at this time. See: Riedel, JFK's Forgotten Crisis, 104 and Christophe Jaffrelot, The Pakistan Paradox: Instability and resilience (New Delhi: Random House, 2015), 299-238. Other accounts that provide only cursory attention to this period in Sino-Pakistani relations include: Andrew Small, The China-Pakistan Axis: Asia's New Geopolitics (London: Hurst, 2015), 9-26; Kux, The United States and Pakistan, Chapters 2-5; Ayesha Jalal, The Struggle for Pakistan: A Muslim Homeland and Global Politics (Boston: Harvard University Press, 2014), Chapters 2-4; Anatol Lieven, Pakistan: A Hard Country (London: Allen Lane, 2011), Part I and II; Shuja Nawaz, Crossed Swords: Pakistan, Its Army and the Wars Within (London: Oxford University press, 2008), 170-202; Ian Talbot, Pakistan: A New History (New Delhi: Amaryllis, 2012), 80-98. A notable exception can be found in John W. Garver, Protracted Contest: Sino-Indian Rivalry in the Twentieth Century (Seattle: University of Washington Press, 2001), Chapters 7 & 8.

¹⁴ Farzana Shaikh, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto: In Pursuit of an Asian Pakistan, in Ramachandra Guha (ed), Makers of Modern Asia (Boston: Harvard University Press: 2014), 278.

¹⁵ For a note see: Small, The China-Pakistan Axis, 9-25.

¹⁶ See Nawaz, Crossed swords.

¹⁷ Amongst the essential secondary (in the domain of diplomatic history and contemporary security) work on Pakistan, little is disclosed about the relationship with China in this period. See: Dennis Kux, The United States and Pakistan, 1947-2000 (Washington DC: Woodrow Wilson Centre Press, 2001), 116-135 and Garver, Protracted contest, 187-192. More recent accounts tell us even less about this relationship, see: Hussain Haqqani, Magnificent delusions: Pakistan, the United States, and an epic history of misunderstanding (New York: Public Affairs, 2013), 90-104 and Ishtiaq Ahmed, Pakistan: The garrison state, origin, evolution, and consequences (London: Oxford University Press, 2013), 127-132.

¹⁸ For a cursory survey see: Rais Ahmad Khan, 'Pakistan in South-East Asia,' Pakistan Horizon, 11/4 (December 1958), 280-287; Werner Levi, 'Pakistan, the Soviet Union and China' Pacific Affairs, 35/3 (Autumn 1962), 211-222; Anwar Syed, 'Sino-Pakistani relations-an overview' Pakistan Horizon, 22/2 (1969), 107-119; Khalid Qureshi, 'Pakistan and the Sino-Indian dispute' Pakistan Horizon, 15/4 (1962), 310-322; O. N. Mehrotra, 'Sino-Pakistan relations: a review' China Report, 12/54 (1976); George. L. Montago, 'Peaceful coexistence: Pakistan and Red China' The Western Political Quarterly, 18/2 Part 1 (June 1965), 309-317; W. M. Dobell, 'Ramifications of the China-Pakistan border treaty' Pacific Affairs, 33/3 (autumn 1964), 283-295.

¹⁹ Mohammad Ayub Khan, Friends not masters: a political biography (London: Oxford University Press, 1967), 119-173.

²⁰ Roeded Khan, The British papers: Secret and confidential, 1958-1969 (London: Oxford University Press, 2002); Foreign Relations of the United States (hereafter FRUS), Volume 6/1949 (Washington DC: US Government Printing Office, 1977); FRUS, Volume IX/1949 (Washington DC: US Government Printing Office, 1974); FRUS, Volume II/1955-1957 (Washington DC: US Government Printing Office, 1986); FRUS, Volume XIX/1958-1960 (Washington DC: US Government Printing Office, 1996); FRUS, Volume XV/1958-1962 (Washington DC: US Government Printing Office, 1992); FRUS, Volume XIX/1961-1963 (Washington DC: US Government Printing Office, 1996).

²¹ For a view of the collection see: <https://global.oup.com/academic/content/series/s/selected-works-of-jawaharlal-nehru-series-swjns/?cc=gb&lang=en> Accessed on 1 February 2016

²² A note on Sino-Pakistani nuclear cooperation can be found in: Small, China-Pakistan Axis, 27-46

²³ 'Article in the Peking People's Daily', 2 February. 1951, [NA] FO 371/92879.

²⁴ Sarvepalli Gopal, Jawaharlal Nehru: A Biography, Volume Two: 1947-1956 (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1979), 100-112.

²⁵ Jawaharlal Nehru, cited in: Sarvepalli Gopal, 'The mind of Jawaharlal Nehru,' in Srinath Raghavan (ed), Sarvepalli Gopal: Imperialists, nationalists, democrats – collected essays (New Delhi: Permanent Black, 2013), 199.

²⁶ For a note see: Dennis Kux, India and the United States: Estranged Democracies (Washington DC: National Defence University Press, 1992), 72-78.

²⁷ Odd Arne Westad, Restless empire: China and the world since 1750 (London: The Bodley Head, 2012), 320-32.

²⁸ Sarvepalli Gopal, Jawaharlal Nehru: A biography, 1889-1947 (New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 2012), 249-250.

²⁹ Pakistan ambassador in Moscow to Chia Chiang (PR ambassador in Moscow), 29 January, 1950, cited in: Jain (ed), China-South Asia relations, 3-4.

³⁰ Zafrullah Khan, 25 September, 1950, cited in: Ibid, 5.

³¹ Karachi to CRO, 29 June. 1951, [NA] FO 371/92879.

³² Ibid.

³³ Note: Pakistan became an Islamic Republic following the implementation of its first constitution in 23 March 1956. See: Jalal, The Struggle for Pakistan, 94-95.

³⁴ CRO to Karachi, 17 September. 1951, [NA] FO 371/92879.

³⁵ For a note on India and the Korean War see: Gopal, Jawaharlal Nehru Volume II, 100-113.

³⁶ CRO to Karachi, 17 September. 1951, [NA] FO 371/92879. Also see: Robert J. McMahon, The Cold War in the Periphery (New York: Columbia University Press, 1994), 123-153.

³⁷ P. N. Haksar Papers, [NMML], Office of the High Commission of India, London, Report Number 13, IIIrd Instalment, Sub file No. 27 B.

³⁸ Garver, Protracted contest, 187.

³⁹ Liaquat Ali Khan to Clement Attlee, 3 January.1949, [NA] DO 142/454.

⁴⁰ CRO to Karachi, 17 September. 1951, [NA] FO 371/92879.

⁴¹ Levi, 'Pakistan, the Soviet Union and China,' 213-215.

⁴² For a brief note on these alliance systems see: McGarr, The Cold War in South Asia, 69-85.

⁴³ Dobell, Ramifications of the China-Pakistan Border treaty, 283.

⁴⁴ Levi, Pakistan, the Soviet Union and China, 215.

⁴⁵ Ibid.

⁴⁶ Ibid.

⁴⁷ Garver, Protracted contest, 190-191.

⁴⁸ . A note on 1955 was found by the author in a document on the boundary agreement created in 1963. CRO to Delhi, 7 March 1963, [NA] DO 196/130.

⁴⁹ Note: This is clearly brought out in meetings between Indian and Chinese officials in 1956. See: Note, recorded by P. Dasgupta, Indian High Commission, Karachi, 15 December.1956 [National Archives, New Delhi, hereafter NAND], MEA PAKISTAN, File No. 4-1/56-Pak-1-III Part.

⁵⁰ D. N. Chatterjee to Indian High Commission in Karachi, New Delhi, 24 February. 1956, [NAND], MEA-PAKISTAN, 4-1/56-PAK-1-III.

⁵¹ C. C. Desai to M. J. Desai, Karachi, 24 November 1956, [NAND], MEA-PAKISTAN, 4-1/56-PAK-1-III.

⁵² 'Chou-En-lai's statement', 23 April, 1955, cited in: Jain (Ed.), China-South Asia relations, 8-9.

⁵³ CRO to Delhi, 7 March. 1963 [NA] DO 196/130.

- ⁵⁴ Begum Shaista Suhrawardy, Huseyn Shaheed Suhrawardy: A biography (Karachi: Oxford Univ. Press, 1991), 6-14.
- ⁵⁵ D. N. Chatterjee to Indian High Commission in Karachi, New Delhi, 24 February. 1956 [NAND] File No. 4-1/56-Pak-1, MEA-Pakistan I.
- ⁵⁶ C. C. Desai to M. J. Desai, Karachi, 24 November. 1956 [NAND], MEA-PAKISTAN, 4-1/56-PAK-1-III.
- ⁵⁷ Mohammad H. R. Talukdar, Memoirs of Huseyn Shaheed Suhrawardy (Dhaka: Univ. Press Limited, 1987), 55-61.
- ⁵⁸ See: Nehru to Mohammad Ali, New Delhi, 30 May, 1956 cited in Sharada Prasad, A. K. Damodaran, Mushirul Hasan (ed), Selected Works of Jawaharlal Nehru [Hereafter SWJN], Second series, Volume 33 (New Delhi: Oxford Univ. Press, 2004), 435.
- ⁵⁹ Note: A briefing on the Soviet leaders' meeting in India is available in a note by Nehru, 'Pakistan's approaches to the Soviet Union,' New Delhi, 9 February, 1957, SWJN Second Series, Volume 36 (New Delhi: Oxford Univ. Press, 2005), 374-375.
- ⁶⁰ 'Record of further talk between the prime minister and Mr N. A. Bulganin and Mr. N. S. Khrushchev,' 13 December. 1955, [NMML], Subimal Dutt Papers, Subject File No. 82.
- ⁶¹ 'Pakistan's approaches to the Soviet Union,' New Delhi, 9 February 1957, Sharada Prasad, A. K. Damodaran, Mushirul Hasan (Ed.), SWJN, Second series, Volume 36 (New Delhi: Oxford Univ. Press, 2005), 374-375.
- ⁶² D. N. Chatterjee to Indian High Commission in Karachi, New Delhi, 24 February. 1956 [NAND], MEA-PAKISTAN, File No. 4-1/56-Pak-1.
- ⁶³ See: 'Note to Menon' 6 May 1956 and 'Note to Subimal Dutt and T. N. Kaul, 12 May 1956, Sharada Prasad, A. K. Damodaran, Mushirul Hasan (Ed.), SWJN, Second series, Volume 33 (New Delhi: Oxford Univ. Press, 2004), 475-76.
- ⁶⁴ Talukdar, Memoirs of Huseyn Shaheed Suhrawardy, 55.
- ⁶⁵ Note: This is clearly brought out in three sets of talks between Nehru and other international leaders on the present state of world affairs. See: 'Summary record of a talk between the Prime minister of India and Mr. Bulganin and Mr. Khrushchev on 21 November. 1955, Subimal Dutt Papers, [NMML]Subject File No. 33; 'Talks held at Belgrade' between Marshal Tito and Nehru, 2 July.1955, Subimal Dutt Papers [NMML] Subject File No. 33; Nehru, 'Note on talks with President Eisenhower,' 8 January. 1957, Subimal Dutt Papers [NMML] Subject File No. 33.

⁶⁶ Subimal Dutt 'Asian-African Cooperation: Retrospect and Prospect, undated [NMML] Subimal Dutt File N. 86.

⁶⁷ 'Talks with Mohammad Ali, London, 5 July 1956, Sharada Prasad, A. K. Damodaran, Mushirul Hasan (Ed.), SWJN, Second series, Volume 34 (New Delhi: Oxford Univ. Press, 2005), 376-378.

⁶⁸ C. C. Desai to M. J. Desai, Karachi, 1 February. 1956, [NAND], MEA-PAKISTAN 1, File No. 4-1/56-PAK-1.

⁶⁹ 'South East Asia Collective Defence Treaty,' Subimal Dutt Papers [NMML] Subject File No. 92

⁷⁰ C. C. Desai to M. J. Desai, Karachi, 9 February. 1956, [NAND], MEA-PAKISTAN File No. 4-1/56-PAK-1.

⁷¹ Note: This line of argument was confirmed to India by Australian interlocutors, see Aide memoire, New Delhi, 3 May. 1956, Subimal Dutt Papers [NMML] Subject File No. 92.

⁷² C. C. Desai to M. J. Desai, Karachi, 5 December. 1956, [NAND], MEA-PAKISTAN, File No. 4-1/56-PAK-1-III.

⁷³ 'Note, Sir Gilbert Laithwait, 28 October. 1958,' cited in: Khan (ed), The British papers, DO 35/8944, 47-48.

⁷⁴ C. C. Desai to M. J. Desai, Karachi, 5 December. 1956 [NAND], MEA-PAKISTAN, File No. 4-1/56-PAK-1-III.

⁷⁵ Karachi to CRO, 19 December. 1958, cited in Khan (ed), The British papers, DO 35/8946, 116.

⁷⁶ Note, 1 October, 1958, cited in: Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, New directions (London: Namara Publications, 1980), 105-107.

⁷⁷ 'China's note of protest to Pakistan, 21 July. 1959,' cited in: Jain (Ed.), China-South Asia relations, 18-20.

⁷⁸ 'Statement by the representative of Pakistan,' 20 October 1959, cited in: Jain (Ed.), Ibid, 22-2.

⁷⁹ Ayub Khan's press interview to Kayhan International, 9 November. 1959, Cited in: Ibid, 23.

⁸⁰ Syed, 'Sino-Pakistani relations,' 111.

⁸¹ Report by Brigadier B Kingzett, Karachi, 4 June. 1958 [NA] FO 371/133389.

⁸² Khan, Friends not masters, 164-166.

⁸³ Ibid, 161-162.

⁸⁴ Riedel, JFK's Forgotten Crisis, 32-34.

⁸⁵ For a background see: Jonathan D. Spence, The Search for Modern China (New York: W. W. Norton, 1990), 586-589.

⁸⁶ Riedel, JFK's Forgotten Crisis, 56-60. Note: A detailed account of the CIA's advance in this time was declassified and available. See: [TNA], CREST 'The Sino-Indian Border War' Section 2 (1959-1961), August 1963.

⁸⁷ Ayub Khan to Kennedy, Karachi, 16 February. 1961, cited in: FRUS Vol. XIX/South Asia, 11.

⁸⁸ Bhutto, New directions, 118-121.

⁸⁹ Memorandum of conversation (hereafter MoC) with Kennedy, Shoaib and others, 7 March. 1961, cited in: FRUS, vol. XIX/South Asia, 19.

⁹⁰ Nehru to Kennedy, 29 January. 1962, B.K Nehru papers [NMML] Instalment I, Serial No. 35.

⁹¹ Note: These were the primary areas of dispute between India and China. For a note see: Raghavan, War and Peace in Modern India, 227-261.

⁹² MoC, Kennedy, Ayub and others, Washington DC, 11 July. 1961, cited in FRUS, vol. XIX/South Asia, 69-74.

⁹³ Canadian High Commission to CRO, Karachi, 22 August. 1961 [NA] DO 196/30.

⁹⁴ V C. Martin to Pitchard, London, 26 July. 1961 [NA], DO 196/130.

⁹⁵ V C. Martin to R Walker, London. 19 July. 1961 [NA], DO 196/130.

⁹⁶ MoC, Karachi to state, 22 March. 1961, cited in FRUS, vol. XIX/South Asia, 27-29.

⁹⁷ New Delhi to state, 24 March. 1961, cited in FRUS, vol. XIX/South Asia, 31.

⁹⁸ Canadian High Commission to CRO, Karachi, 22 August. 1961 [NA] DO 196/30.

⁹⁹ MoC from state to Bundy, 15 June. 1962, cited in FRUS, vol. XIX/South Asia, 276.

¹⁰⁰ Note, V. C. Martin to Hampshire, 12 September. 1961 [NA] DO 196/30.

¹⁰¹ 'Text of Indian protest letter,' undated [NA] DO 196/30.

¹⁰² Ibid.

¹⁰³ For a note see: McGarr, The Cold War in South Asia, 149-166.

¹⁰⁴ Nehru to Macmillan, 24 October. 1962 [NA] FO 371/164914. Also see: Galbraith to Kennedy, 16 October. 1962, [John F. Kennedy Library and Museum, hereafter JKLM], Galbraith Correspondence with Kennedy NSC Box 118 a.

- ¹⁰⁵ MoC, Kennedy, Ayub and others, Washington DC, 11 July. 1961, cited in FRUS, vol. XIX/South Asia, pp. 69-74 and Karachi to state, 5 November. 1961, cited in FRUS, Ibid, 369-371.
- ¹⁰⁶ Macmillan to Ayub Khan, 25 October. 1962 [NA] FC 371/164914.
- ¹⁰⁷ Ayub to Kennedy, 5 November. 1962, cited in FRUS, Ibid, 378-379.
- ¹⁰⁸ Nehru to Ayub, 12 November. 1962 [NA] FO 371/164920.
- ¹⁰⁹ Cited in: Haqqani, Magnificent delusions, 104.
- ¹¹⁰ Galbraith, Ambassadors journal, 381-385.
- ¹¹¹ Sandy's to Nehru, London, 26 October. 1962 [Duncan Sandy's Papers, Churchill College, Cambridge, hereafter DSND] 8/1.
- ¹¹² MoC, Ayub, Harriman and Sandy's, Rawalpindi, 28 November. 1962, cited in FRUS, 409-411.
- ¹¹³ Karachi to CRO, 21 November. 1962 [NA] FO 371/164920.
- ¹¹⁴ Sandy's to CRO, Rawalpindi, 30 November. 1962 [DSND] 8/1.
- ¹¹⁵ For a firsthand account see: Y. D. Gundevia, Outside the Archives (New Delhi: Sangam Books, 1984), 260-262.
- ¹¹⁶ Galbraith, Ambassadors Journal, 457.
- ¹¹⁷ Delhi to CRO, 17 December. 1962 [DSND] 8/1.
- ¹¹⁸ Gore-Booth, With great truth and respect, 303.
- ¹¹⁹ Schaffer, The Limits of Influence, 80-87.
- ¹²⁰ Morrice James, 'Note on Pakistan and China', Karachi, 11 June. 1963 [NA] 196/131.
- ¹²¹ Y. D. Gundevia, Outside the archives (Hyderabad: Sangam Books, 1984), 260-261.
- ¹²² Boundary agreement between Pakistan and China,' 2 March. 1963 [NA] DO 196/131.
- ¹²³ , Karachi to CRO, 22 February. 1963 [NA] DO 196/30.
- ¹²⁴ MoC, Ahmed, Talbot and others, Washington DC, 23 February. 1963, cited in FRUS, vol. XIX/South Asia, 510-511.
- ¹²⁵ Note: Evidence of such a time-table can be traced by analysing the following, 'The disputed frontier of Kashmir,' 20 November. 1962, [TNA], CREST, CIA/RR (62-9); 'Pakistan and the free world alliance,' 10 July. 1964, [TNA], CREST, CIA: Office of Current Intelligence; Morrice James, 'Note on Pakistan and China', Karachi, 11 June. 1963 [NA] 196/131; Canadian High Commission to CRO, Karachi, 22 August. 1961 [NA] DO 196/30.
- ¹²⁶ 'Nawabzada Raza dies,' New York Times. 16 June. 1984.

- ¹²⁷ Small, The China-Pakistan Axis, 23.
- ¹²⁸ Gauhar, Ayub Khan, 116.
- ¹²⁹ Gore-Booth, With great truth and respect, 300-307.
- ¹³⁰ Gundevia, Outside the archives, 279.
- ¹³¹ Karachi to CRO, 22 February. 1963 [NA] DO 196/30.
- ¹³² Note: This is evidenced by the authorisation of the supply of 50,000 .303 rifles to India in February 1963. See: Sandy's to M. C. Chagla, London. 12 February. 1963 [DSND] 8/13.
- ¹³³ McGarr, The Cold War in South Asia, 196-201.
- ¹³⁴ Gauhar, Ayub Khan, 140.
- ¹³⁵ Karachi to CRO, 26 February. 1962 [NA] DO196/30.
- ¹³⁶ Macmillan to Kennedy, 22 January. 1963 [NA] DO 196/30.
- ¹³⁷ Kennedy to Nehru, 9 March. 1963, cited in FRUS, vol. XIX/South Asia, 520.
- ¹³⁸ Rusk to Kennedy, 25 April. 1963, cited in Ibid, 557.
- ¹³⁹ See: Rudra Chaudhuri, Forged in Crisis: India and the United States Since 1947 (New York: Oxford University Press, 2014), 142-147.
- ¹⁴⁰ Karachi to CRO, 26 February, 1962 [NA] DO196/30.
- ¹⁴¹ A. G. Noorani, 'Facing the truth', Frontline 23/20 (7-20 October, 2006), available at: <http://www.frontline.in/static/html/fl2320/stories/20061020001608500.htm>, accessed on 25 July, 2015.
- ¹⁴² 'Boundary agreement between Pakistan and China,' 2 March. 1963 [NA] DO 196/131.
- ¹⁴³ Alistair Buchan to Sandy's, London, 9 July. 1965 [DSND] 11/3/2.
- ¹⁴⁴ Pew Research Poll, 'Chapter 4: How Asian View Each Other' (July 2014), Available at: <http://www.pewglobal.org/2014/07/14/chapter-4-how-asians-view-each-other/>
- ¹⁴⁵ Small, China-Pakistan Axis, 181
- ¹⁴⁶ 'Story of the first encounter with raiders in Poonch,' New Delhi, 5 September 1965 [NAND], Information and Broadcasting Ministry, File No. 9/1/65-KP
- ¹⁴⁷ Garver, Protracted Contest, 195-203
- ¹⁴⁸ Kux, The United States and Pakistan, 147-149
- ¹⁴⁹ Chester Bowles to State Department, New Delhi, 18 October 1965 [Lyndon B. Jonson Presidential Library, hereafter LBJL] NSF Country Files: India, Vol 6, 9:65-1:66
- ¹⁵⁰ Memorandum for the President, Washington, 7 September 1965 [LBJL] NSF Files of Robert W. Komer, Kashmir, December 1963-March 1966, Box 37
- ¹⁵¹ Cited in Garver, Protracted Contest, 204

¹⁵² A short note on Johnson's disinterest can be found in: Husain Haqqani, Magnificent Delusions: Pakistan, The United States, and an Epic History of Misunderstanding (New York: Public Affairs, 2013), 113-116

¹⁵³ Chaudhuri, Forged in Crisis, 157-164

¹⁵⁴ Henry Kissinger, On China (London: Allen Lane, 2011), p. 236-267

¹⁵⁵ Srinath Raghavan, 1971: A Global History of the Creation of Bangladesh (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2013), 262-263

¹⁵⁶ Ibid, 254-257

¹⁵⁷ Ibid, 184-186

¹⁵⁸ For details see Small, The China-Pakistan Axis, 14-15

¹⁵⁹ Raghavan, 1971, 262

¹⁶⁰ Small, The China-Pakistan Axis, 57-60

¹⁶¹ Authors interview with Brajesh Misra, New Delhi, 11 August 2008. Also see: Chaudhuri, Forged in Crisis, 184-186

¹⁶² For details see: Fahad Shah, 'A Costly Corridor' Foreign Affairs, Snapshot (3 December 2015), Available at: <https://www.foreignaffairs.com/articles/asia/2015-12-03/costly-corridor> and Jonah Blank, Thank You For Being a Friend, Foreign Affairs, Snapshot (15 October 2015), Available at: <https://www.foreignaffairs.com/articles/china/2015-10-15/thank-you-being-friend>

¹⁶³ Authors interview with Brajesh Misra, New Delhi, 11 August 2008

¹⁶⁴ For a note see: C. Christine Faure and Sumit Ganguly, 'An Unworthy Ally' Foreign Affairs, Vol. 95, No. 5 (September/October 2015)